

Bohdan Chreptak

I've been framing images for as long as I can remember. Most often this was an inadvertent seizure of the moment; an attempt to halt the march and allow for an inspection of contrast, line and proportion. This was unconscious though. Nothing more than an abstraction lifted from the edge of a daydream...until I began to record these moments through a lens.

It's been a few years since I picked up the camera. In that time, frame has measured against frame, edge against edge, and an evolution of intent has fallen into place, leaving me infatuated with time held still.

I am without the framework of any training or instruction and have embraced this as an asset in a field that prides itself on fresh perspective.
